Semiconductor devices called ASICs (Application Specific ICs) have been widely used. A typical application of a semiconductor device such as an integrated circuit is for a microprocessor, for example, an embedded processor. A microprocessor is typically used to control a certain system, and can be used for specific applications such as a security system and a control system. In semiconductor devices, while the amount of a current flowing through the device increases with an increase in an operating speed of the device, the amount of heat generated by the device cannot be reduced. Accordingly, a semiconductor device for use in a system having a fast operating speed needs to be manufactured in consideration of heat dissipation. A semiconductor device, typically a microprocessor, also operates based on instructions having instructions which process a large amount of data and consume a relatively large amount of power. In other words, an increase in a speed of the semiconductor device results in an increase in a power consumption. In the case of a system using a microprocessor, the speed of the microprocessor and the amount of power consumption determine the performance of the system. To achieve low power consumption in semiconductor devices, a semiconductor device has been proposed which includes a first and second pipeline operation unit and a pipeline merging unit (see, for example, Unexamined Japanese Patent Publication No. 2006-261804). A prior art semiconductor device including the first and second pipeline operation unit and the pipeline merging unit will be explained with reference to the drawings. FIG. 9 is a schematic block diagram showing a typical prior art semiconductor device. The prior art semiconductor device 900 includes a first pipeline operation unit 910, a second pipeline operation 0cc13bf012
